REFERENCES PAGE INSTRUCTIONS

1. In the body of your text refer to the source of your information by inserting consecutive numbers in brackets at the end of each segment of cited information—like this [1]. These reference numbers can also be inserted within a sentence [2], without changing the sentence's punctuation. You may also cite your reference in your text as follows: "As Smithsky [3] points out,...
2. Unless you are referring to a complete book or article, you will also need to identify the page number(s) of your source of information. Indicate exact page numbers of a source within your brackets after a comma [4, pp. 3-6], or by a simple rhetorical device in your text such as "However, on page 79 of [5] the author seems to contradict himself when he states. . ." If you must refer to more than one separate page or source in the same reference, use semicolons for separation: [6, p. 46; 7, pp. 29-31; 9, pp. 8-12].
3. Once you have numbered a source use the same number for all subsequent references to that source. References at the end of quotation marks "are punctuated with the period after the reference" [8, p. 23].
4. Always use square brackets around reference numbers [10, pp. 78-85] to distinguish from equation numbers, which are given in parentheses (6).

5. Single space individual references, with no indentation for a second or third line. Double space between separate references.
6. Use a common abbreviation for a journal title if there is one, e.g. IEEE Electron Device Lett. Otherwise give the full name of the journal.
7. End each entry with a period.
8. List each source only once on your reference page.
